

Dr. Chereese F. Fine is a higher education professional that has worked in numerous areas that include diversity and inclusion, academic affairs, student affairs, and athletics. She currently works at Clemson University as the Director of Academic Programs and Engagement in the Charles H. Houston Center for the Study of the Black Experience in Education, where she focuses on programs and research centered on college access and readiness, retention, and success among students of color.

As a scholar-practitioner, Dr. Fine is dedicated to transforming research into practice. Her research focuses on the academic and social experiences of underrepresented college students, as well as the dynamics between intercollegiate athletics and higher education. She is also dedicated to student success and spends time mentoring high school and college students in helping them navigate through their academic experiences and building their professional development skills.

An alumna twice of the University of New Mexico, Dr. Fine holds both a B.B.A in Marketing Management and a M.S. in Sport Administration. She earned her Ph.D. in Educational Leadership at Clemson University.
