

Brandi Wells-Stone, Ph.D. (she/her) currently serves as Executive Director for Student Support at the University of New Mexico. A proud second-generation Lobo alumna, she earned her bachelor's and master's degrees from UNM and her doctorate from New Mexico State University. She previously served as Director of UNM's African American Student Services and brings more than a decade of experience in student affairs, organizational leadership, and work advancing student success and belonging.

As a scholar-practitioner, Brandi approaches leadership through joyful collaboration, co-construction, and a commitment to strengthening the systems, relationships, and opportunities that allow communities to thrive. Her scholarship draws on decolonial and Black feminist frameworks to examine leadership, institutional structures, spatial politics, and the conditions that shape experiences of belonging in higher education.

Brandi is a co-editor of the forthcoming volume Making Servingness a Reality: Confronting Past Harms and Dreaming New Futures. Her professional and community engagement extends across New Mexico and nationally, including leadership with the Race Amity Project and the New Mexico Black Education Advisory Council, service on the national board of the National Association for Black Culture Centers, and a recently completed term as NASPA's Undergraduate Fellows Program Assessment Co-Chair.

Outside of work, Brandi enjoys traveling, staying active, and spending time with her husband and three children.
